On May 15, 2009, the remains of an unidentified male child were found buried in sand at a city playground. The child is estimated to be between 3 and 5 years of age and is believed to have died within 3 days of his discovery. He may be of American Indian or Hispanic descent. He had dark brown to black hair. The child was wearing a red t-shirt with a red monster truck decal; black pants with an elastic waistband and two red vertical stripes down each pant leg; and black Skechers sneakers with green and white horizontal stripes. Photographs of the child's clothing are shown above. The image at left is a composite created by a forensic artist at the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children to depict what the child may have looked like in life. Items such as eye color and hair style are the artist's estimations to complete the image and should not be used as significant markers for identification.
